Synaptec Builds Connection between LawBase Software and Google Maps

New Technology Expected to Revolutionize Law Firms and Government Agencies

Denver, CO, August 15, 2006...

Sometimes a picture is more informative than the printed word. LawBase Matter Management Software's new integration to Google Maps allows users to see data in a map format that can quickly show trends that might not be discernable in a standard data format. The plotting of geographic locations can be used by law firms, corporate legal departments and governmental agencies to track locations of incidents, insurance claims, and much more.

How the Integration Works

Users first search the LawBase matter management database by entering in desired fields of information such as geographic location, name or contact type. Once LawBase completes its search, the program then sends the results to Google Maps, which plots corresponding points on internet-based maps. LawBase sites then can use the results to see where their contacts are geographically located.

Applications of the LawBase/Google Maps Integration

Synaptec's research has yielded many possible applications of the technology, which provide:

- Utility and insurance companies the ability to track claims resulting from natural disasters or contamination.
- Government Agencies a system to better detect fraud and investigate claims.
- Prosecution Offices a more effective way to investigate crimes and protect the communities they serve.
- A corporate legal department could track all expiring leases in the next 6 months and see geographically if it would make sense from a business standpoint to consolidate locations.

“Applications of the Law Base/Google Maps link in the field are virtually unlimited and have great potential to streamline operations,” said Phil Homburger, President of Synaptec Software. “By displaying Law Base data in a compelling visual way on Google Maps, the integration will help law firms, corporate legal departments and government agencies to be more effective.”
